

Career Path: The Worst Career Advice

Law Department Management

Skills and Professional Development

Request reuse permissions

Banner artwork by everything bagel / Shutterstock.com

I've noted before that bad advice is plentiful. See Career Path: Develop Principles. Still, I was stunned to read in an otherwise respectable publication what I think is quite possibly the worst career advice ever.

The Wall Street Journal recently published an article about job switchers with the subheading, "Even if you're happy at your job, getting a new job for more pay is a good strategy as inflation eats into paychecks."

---

I've come across similar advice before: Always go after the bigger paycheck. Your future raises build off your base salary, so target the highest paying job; titles matter more than substance, so grab the CEO title if you want to earn the big bucks.

Will making more money change your life in meaningful ways?

Artwork by alwie99d / Shutterstock.com

To be clear, this advice is spot-on if all you want is to make more money. But it is fantastically wrong if you want to be happy in life. And if you place money first at work, you eventually may be much more likely to question your career choices than to have a good career. See Career Path: Sit Down and Stay Awhile.

The Journal article discusses data from the US Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, indicating that job switchers in 2022 saw raises of 6.4 percent, while job stayers saw increases of only 4.7 percent. Never mind that today's market is actually not unusual. There is almost always a spread between job switchers and stayers, and job switchers typically increase their salary as part of a switch.

What specifically are my objections to switching jobs to make more money? They are threefold:

1. We are selfish if we think of our jobs only insofar as they meet our needs.
2. We become more effective at our jobs with specific experience in our jobs.

-
3. It is dangerously misleading to reinforce the idea that making more money will improve your life.

Your job is about more than you

We talk about directors and officers (D&Os) of a company "serving" in their capacities. The directors serve at the pleasure of shareholders, and the officers serve at the pleasure of the board of directors. Although D&Os are typically paid handsomely for their service, their fiduciary duties are a tremendous responsibility to the constituents whose interests they serve.

If you place money first at work, you eventually may be much more likely to question your career choices than to have a good career.

I kept a phrase at the top of my mind whenever dealing with my board and officer colleagues: I like you and respect you, but I don't work for you. I am here to serve the company and its shareholders. Thus, when evaluating priorities, I will always choose those actions that support the company's interests. Sometimes those interests may conflict with individual D&O interests, although, thankfully, that's rare.

I don't expect every employee to feel the same about fiduciary duties as the GC. But it is reasonable to expect all employees to identify with their companies and wish to see them succeed. If you find yourself feeling that your company owes you something and you owe nothing in return but to do your job, you are a bad employee.

You need time to get good at your job

Job effectiveness is only partially about your specific background and skillset. And anyway, there are more than enough people with the raw talent to do most jobs. What makes a person stand out as a super performer? You shine when you know enough about their company, colleagues, and culture to effectively drive strategic initiatives.

Good ideas are plentiful. However, the ability to implement good ideas is rare. Successfully implementing a good idea requires a mix of realism, humility, and doggedness that most people never find. The people who develop this mix typically do so only after some years on the job.

They learn about their company's history, including its past successes and failures. They identify who the respected voices are by finding people who can help speed a project along or, conversely, stop one in its tracks. And they learn how their proposed initiatives fit with the company's overall strategy, recognizing opportune times to push when they know they'll find a tailwind.

Successfully implementing a good idea requires a mix of realism, humility, and doggedness that most people never find.

People who switch jobs every few years learn none of this. They forever run up against walls they don't even understand. Ironically, this makes them more likely to switch jobs again, before frustration and burnout (and their own lack of results) derail them.

---

Making money is a means, not an end

Some of the most ambitious people I know would seem to have the least to complain about. Generous six figure salaries, comfortable work environments, and enviable lifestyles. And despite their objective advantages, they are tempted by a higher salary, an ostensible promotion, or a new company.

The happiest people I know are the ones who learn that success is not measured in money.

Artwork by Complot / Shutterstock.com

When I ask, "Will making more money change your life in meaningful ways?" or "What is it that makes you successful in your current job, and will you have the same advantages in your new one?" they don't have ready answers. It's as if they have identified objective markers for success (bigger salary, title, company, etc.) and feel compelled to be more successful.

The happiest people I know are the ones who learn that success is not measured in money. I wrote about them in The Stoic Career, and the lessons abide: Can you say you like, trust, and respect the people you work with? Is your work interesting, challenging, and valuable? And do you share values with a solid company that has a strategy for continued success? Then, you have all you need to be happy and successful in your career.

---

And if you find yourself in that position, why on earth would you give up a great job for a little more money, or even a lot more money? If you do, you risk getting not only what you want, but what you deserve.

Be well.

Question, comment? Contact Career Path columnist James Bellerjeau.

---

Disclaimer: The information in any resource in this website should not be construed as legal advice or as a legal opinion on specific facts, and should not be considered representing the views of its authors, its sponsors, and/or ACC. These resources are not intended as a definitive statement on the subject addressed. Rather, they are intended to serve as a tool providing practical guidance and references for the busy in-house practitioner and other readers.

James Bellerjeau

Lecturer

University of Zurich

James Bellerjeau is a lecturer in the LLM program of the University of Zürich and for the Europa Institut of the University of Zürich.

Bellerjeau served for two decades as group general counsel for Mettler-Toledo International Inc., an S&P 500 company with its worldwide headquarters in Greifensee, Switzerland. He then led Mettler-Toledo's global Sustainability program for several years through June 2021.

Bellerjeau shares thoughts on how to live a good life at Klugne. You can also follow him on LinkedIn.